He now proposes to utilise the amount by establishing a silk reeling house in Chennapatna with apparatus for 20 basins to start with. He estimates the cost of the first 20 basins to amount to Rs 4000 including the boiler + the heating chamber + proposes to proceed with the work. He is of opinion that the Japanese method of reeling can be carried on a commercial basis + that there is local market for the silk reeled. The reeling house is proposed to be located in the old building of the Industrial School.

Industrial School was located, and to equip it as soon as possible with silk reeling apparatus for 20 basins, and to gradually extend the scale of operations till about 100 basins are at work. We may take it that a 100 basins will turn out one lakh of rupees worth of silk reeled per annum, and that the work will be carried on with no expense to Government, excepting the initial outlay. It is possible that the work might even be done at a profit; and I am convinced that, under private management, it will certainly result in a profit: but it is difficult to get people to work as hard for Government as they will for private individuals. I do not expect therefore to do more than cover the working expenses.

(4) I am unable to submit an accurate estimate of the cost of the plant, but I do not think it will exceed Rs. 100/- per basin, exclusive of the cost of a small steam boiler, and a small heating chamber in which to dry the cocoons. I expect that the first 20 basins will cost us Rs. 4000/-, including the boiler and heating chamber, and that the subsequent basins can be added at an additional cost of Rs. 100 each. There is at my disposal a sum of Rs. 5,000/- for silk experiments, and with this sum I shall be able to proceed with the work; and before any further expenditure on this is incurred, a further report can be submitted.

(5) I think that our first experiments conclusively shew that the Japanese method of reeling introduced by the late Mr. J.N. Tata, and still continued at the Bangalore Silk Farm, can be carried on on a commercial basis, and that there is a local market for the silk so reeled; at any rate, up to the limit that I have now proposed to develop it. It has been well-known for years past that very good silk is being turned out in small quantities at the Farm; but, hitherto, no real attempt has been made to estimate the cost of reeling, or to ascertain whether or not there was a local market for the silk. We have definitely asecertained by our experiments that there is a good prospect of a profitable industry developing along the lines on which I propose to work.

Order thereon No. 9446-8/Sm 3/[illegible]

Dated Bangalore /7-[illegible] 1913

The Director reports that the experiments carried on at the Salvation Army Farm conclusively show that the Japanese method of reeling silk introduced by the late Mr. J.N.Tata can be carried on on a commercial basis, that there is a local market for the silk so reeled and that there is a good prospect of a profitable industry developing on the lines suggested by him.

the factory is placed on a sound working basis, local capital and enterprise may be readily forthcoming to take up the management and develop the business.
